

Endodontic Treatment

We keep your smile beautiful.

Common Endodontic Treatments

Healthy Tooth

Infected Tooth

Tooth decay can cause a tooth abscess (infection), which can damage surrounding bone, leading to premature loss of the tooth if left unattended.

Straight Root

Curved Root

Some teeth have curved roots, calcified canals or severe infection, which may be difficult to treat. Your endodontist has the clinical training, skills and special instruments to properly treat such conditions with a favorable outcome.

Healthy Canal

Blocked Canal

Calcified canals are usually an outcome of calcium deposits, which are a result of natural aging or accumulated irritation, such as teeth injuries, deep fillings or decay.

What is an endodontist?

Endodontists are dentists with at least two additional years of advanced specialty education in endodontics (root canals). They use their special training and experience to diagnose, treat and/or retreat difficult root canals, such as narrow or “calcified” (hardened by calcium) canals or teeth with unusual anatomy. Patients are referred to an endodontist by their general dentist. An endodontist’s main goal is to save the natural tooth from extraction by treating inflammation and infections of the pulp tissue (nerves, blood vessels and connective tissue) found within the tooth chamber and canals.

What is a root canal treatment?

A root canal is a common treatment performed by a general dentist, or for complex cases, an endodontist. It involves removing the tooth’s pulp and then cleaning, shaping and filling the canals with accepted biocompatible material, such as gutta percha.

When involved, an endodontist can diagnose and then conveniently treat patients on the same day. Prior to treatment, the endodontist will administer local anesthetics to patients to provide higher levels of comfort. When treatment has been completed, a follow-up appointment will be scheduled to permanently restore the tooth. This is absolutely necessary to keep the tooth functional.
